A FINE SUITE OF PRINTS reproducing in actual size German and Northern Italian drawings in the collection formed by the Nuremberg merchant and humanist Paulus II Praun (1548–1616). It is the first and most impressive of three albums of reproductive prints after drawings produced by Johann Gottlieb Prestel in collaboration with his wife, Maria Katharina, in which aquatint is used to imitate the manner of a wash.¹ Although admired by Goethe and many others,² these extravagant volumes – reputedly printed in editions of about one hundred and fifty copies³ – were commercial disasters, twice bankrupting the couple, first in Nuremberg (1782), again in Frankfurt (1786). The technical virtuosity of the prints, however, established ‘Prestel’ as a byword for fidelity in reproduction (the name was thus revived by the ‘Prestel Verlag’ in Frankfurt in 1924).

A passionate collector throughout his life, Paulus Praun gathered (according to a posthumous inventory) around 250 paintings, 300 pieces of sculpture, 800 drawings, 6000 prints, 4000 coins, and 1200 cut stones and jewels. After his death these collections were installed in the family residence on the Weinmarkt in Nuremberg, where according to the testator’s wish they were to be housed inalienably under the administration of the senior family member. By 1772, the family had come to regard the collections as ‘dead capital’ and resolved to sell them. The then head of the family, Sigmund Christoph Ferdinand von Praun, instructed in that year Christoph Gottlieb von Murr (1733–1811) to prepare a new inventory and also to market the collections. Murr completed his inventory in 1778 and published it in the Journal zur Kunstgeschichte und allgemeinen Litteratur, of which he was editor, and in his guidebook to the ‘principal curiosities of the H.R. Empire’s Free City of Nuremberg’.

The idea of promoting the more important drawings in the collection through reproductive prints collectible in their own right probably was in Murr’s mind from the outset. According to announcements he placed in his Journal in 1776, the prints were intended to appear at four-month intervals in cahiers of six plates each, priced 7 Gulden 30 Kreuzer. Initially, this pace was kept; however in 1778, after six cahiers had been issued, progress slowed: just two cahiers were produced in 1778–1779. The project – which Murr had expected to extend to more than one hundred prints – was then quickly brought to an end. In April 1780, a drawings collector, Kurfürst Karl Theodor von der Pfalz, consented to receive the dedication, a happy event which Murr celebrated in his Journal. A dedication plate, and also a new title-plate (replacing one dated 1776)⁴ were then engraved by J.G. Sturm, to accompany the forty-seven completed prints.⁵

² d’Allemange, et des Pays-Bas, Tirés de divers célèbres Cabinets (the so-called ‘Kleine Kabinett’, title and thirty-six prints of drawings from various collections, including twelve from the Praun collection). Excluding eleven plates by other hands, the three works contain 106 prints after drawings of which more than half (65) were by Maria Katharina Prestel.

The Prestel’s album proved however to be of no utility in selling the Praun collection. A further catalogue of the Praun collections was published by Murr in 1797, but it too failed to elicit a buyer. Having waited in vain for offers, the family in 1801 accepted an offer in toto from the art dealer Johann Friedrich Frauenholz.⁶ The collection of drawings was offered at auction in 1804, fully catalogued by Frauenholz.⁷ About 400 sheets were acquired by Nikolaus II Esterhazy (1765–1833) for his vast collections, which later laid the foundations for the Budapest Museum of Fine Arts;⁸ many others were bought by Duke Albert of Saxe-Teschen (1738–1822), later to be subsumed in the Graphische Sammlung Albertina in Vienna.

The resin-ground aquatint process, newly developed in France, had still very few practitioners by 1775, when the Prestels began making these prints.⁹ How they learned the technique is unknown. Before his arrival in Nuremberg, in 1769, Johann Prestel had travelled extensively in Italy, and it is supposed that he saw there the reproductions of toned drawings executed by Andrea Scacciati and Stefano Mulinari, using a distinct but related tonal printing process they had learned from the Nuremberg printmaker Johann Adam

Schweickart (1722–1787). Murr was an apologist for Schweickart and long-time advocate of his process.¹⁰ It could be that he encouraged Johann Prestel to become proficient in the techniques then fashionable for the facsimile reproduction of drawings, including both Crayonmanier and aquatint. Maria Katharina (1747–1794), daughter of the Nuremberg merchant Thomas Höll, an amateur artist who had been a pupil of Johann Prestel before their marriage, in 1772, was doubtless instructed in these techniques by her husband. She became a full collaborator, executing more than half the prints in the three albums published during the twelve years they worked together.¹¹
