THIS MEDAL was cast in the third year of Clement IX's pontificate to celebrate the restoration of the Pons Aelius, the Hadrianic bridge leading across the Tiber to the Castel Sant' Angelo, and its new sculptural decoration executed from drawings and models supplied by Gian Lorenzo Bernini.²

It is the first documented work of the medallist Chéron and its astonishing sophistication has raised doubts that he was wholly responsible for its design. The portrait of Clement IX on the obverse is similar to the one appearing on a medal by Alberto Hamerani struck in the same year and it has been suggested that both medallists 'made use of a drawing provided by a major artist. While it is tempting to hypothesize that that artist was Bernini and many circumstantial arguments could be adduced in his favor, the name of Carlo Maratta merits equal consideration'.³ Likewise, the reverse of the medal is believed to depend on a lost drawing by Bernini.⁴

This example featured in exhibitions held in 1974 and 1981 (cited above); other published examples include
