THIS remarkable large cast medal was commissioned by the papal agent Domenico Jacobacci, designed by Gian Lorenzo Bernini, and executed in 1659 by the papal medallist Gioacchino Francesco Travani. On the obverse is a portrait bust of Pope Alexander VII and depicted on the reverse is the legend of Androclus and the Lion at the moment the lion suddenly cowers and spares the life of a condemned slave who once pulled a thorn from its foot. An inscription on an illusionistic scroll proclaims 'The beast, too, remembers the kindness'.

The legend of Androclus and the Lion was popularized in the second-century Noctes Atticae of Aulus Gellius and is recommended in Giovanni Ferro's Teatro d'Imprese of 1623 as an appropriate subject to signify gratitude. The cowering lion symbolizes Rome's thankful remembrance of the pope's munificence and courageous leadership during the plague of 1656–1657.

Although Bernini never assumed the title of papal medallist, he was commissioned by Alexander VII and by his successor, Clement IX, to design several annuale struck by Gaspare Morone Mola, and his name can be linked also to some cast medals executed by Travani commemorating various events. The evidence for Bernini's authorship of the Androclus medal includes an entry in Cardinal Flavio Chigi's inventory for the lost original drawing and two prints commemorating the casting of the medal, one designed by Bernini and engraved in 1659 by G.B. Bonacina with the phrases 'numisma opus Bernini' and 'ex auro argento atque aere iam fusam' in its legend.²

The vigorous design of the austere, yet sympathetic portrait of Alexander VII on the obverse is derived from the same model as a larger uniface medallion, and both are compatible with Bernini's certified profile portraits of popes.³ A variant of the portrait signed with the medallist's initials is known.⁴

Although Bernini was certainly involved in the over-all design of the medal, the composition of the reverse depicting Androclus and the Lion may have been entrusted to Pietro da Cortona, another artist favoured by Alexander VII, and Bernini's rival. The second of the two prints portraying the medal, an 'Allegory of the Liberation of Rome from the Plague', was engraved by Bonacina in 1660 after a drawing by Pietro da Cortona (Fig. 1).⁵ Its legend does not indicate Bernini's authorship and the publication of the print may have had no other purpose than to draw attention to Pietro's involvement in the design.⁶

In its size, scale, and compositional complexity, the Androclus medal aspires to the grander status of the plaque or the small relief sculpture. It stands out in the sequence of papal medals and because of its perspectival illusionism and pictorial effect is promoted as ‘the first baroque medal’.⁷ Accordingly, it is often exhibited: in 1969 in Louisville,⁸ and in the 1981 Vatican City, 1983 Ann Arbor, 1986 Ottawa, 1988 Toronto, 1998 Edinburgh, 1998 Ariccia, 1999 Rome, 2000 Siena, and 2003 Madrid exhibitions here cited.
